

"Without other philtre than my own ardent love."—Zoraya.

SORCERESS

BY GEORGE MOREHEAD.

Mrs. Patrick Campbell, the great emotional actress, is now playing her successfully in Sardou's picturesque, romantic drama, "The Sorceress."

For myself; and unguents, elixirs and powders to heal the sick." "What! Medicines from those vile and poisonous plants?" "Ah! but they are also healthful and soothing," she replied. "The scarlet fruit of the hennaba, as well as that of the belladonna, provoke delirium and insanity, but they also bring sleep and rest to the bed of suffering. It is with them as with everything in this world—even with love itself—according to the case and the dose, they prove a remedy or a poison." "Oh, as to that, I venture to wager that you deal in love philtres," Zoraya laughed lightly, as she replied. "Never!" exclaimed Zoraya. "Never! In spite of those eyes." "Oh, indeed! So modest and chaste, in spite of those eyes." "Oh, no! my beauty, you are hard to please. Let me tell you a secret. If it were not for some evil purpose, why did you remove the body of young Kalem?" "Human flesh was not made to fasten ravens and wolves," she replied. "Yes, in a crevice of these rocks, I can show you the spot, it was buried." "You knew that he was a criminal?" "He was not a criminal in my eyes," she replied, smiling. "He was only a man who was to be a lover." "Yes, of a Christian woman, in defor a few minutes before she said: "I see that you are loyal, my lord, loyal and brave, but of a weak and vacillating mind." "Where do you see that?" "In the line of the thumb, and that first joint of your thumb, which is ruled short. I see here that you are subject to sudden and frightful bursts of anger." This statement amused Enrique. He laughed merrily and exclaimed: "That is quite true! It is not, Ramiro?" "I muttered to his companion in a low voice: 'I would to Heaven he had one now that would cause him to strangle you cursed witch!'" Zoraya continued: "The line of life, distinct at the beginning, stops short. There is danger of death—sudden and dreadful as a thunderbolt."

"Ah! that of the soldier, so much the better!" exclaimed Enrique, gayly. "Come, sit down; you will be more at ease," he added, as he made room for her beside him on the stone. She accepted the proffered seat and resumed her reading.

"These lines which cross at the base of the thumb indicate a disposition very, very amiable." Enrique was highly pleased; he laughed heartily and exclaimed: "Oh, as to that, you are quite right!" "This great red furrow which again connects the thumb to the line of life denotes passion. Oh, a great one which holds you body and soul! It will end only with your life." "Is it reciprocated?" he asked. "I cannot tell, but there are many obstacles."

"During her examination of his hand Zoraya had unconsciously drawn closer to Enrique until she was quite against him. The contact of their bodies, the warmth of her hand, and more particularly the strange, penetrating odor of the Arabian perfumes which were exhaled from her clothing and her hair, combined to excite and intoxicate him.

This romantic interview by moonlight with a strange and fascinating woman, who held his hand and pressed her warm and perfumed body close to his own, was well calculated to affect the senses and disturb the heart of a man so susceptible to female charms as the gallant Don Enrique.

"From what flower did you steal that perfume for your hair?" he asked. "From the golden cassia," she replied. "It is exquisite," he murmured, in soft, low tones. "How can you read the future so well in my hand—can you also read what is passing in my mind or present?"

"Yes, you think that I am beautiful and desirable." "Yes," cried Enrique, quickly. "But, alas! a Saracen, a Pagan, a reproach—one you have no right to love." "And for that reason, the more to be desired," he argued.

"Then you think the royal edict very unjust?" he asked. "It is in a dungeon cell, and you, in the arms of a woman, at the stake." "Most unjust and cruel," asserted Enrique. "Was not Kalem very excusable to you?"
